

Michael Hiscox, Professor of Government at Harvard University, speaks about “The Demand for Labor Standards: New Evidence from Online Experiments in Social Labeling of Imported Products” on May 18, 2007, at the Mershon Center for International Security Studies.

Marcus Holmes (left), Ph.D. student in Political Science, critiques Hiscox’s paper. In his talk, Hiscox discussed experiments he ran to determine whether consumers are willing to pay higher prices for products labeled as fair trade. The lecture and discussion were part of the Mershon Center’s Globalization, Institutions and Economic Security workshop.
